The National Assembly needs your help! We are conducting research around the barriers faced by organizations to implement two-generation programming; We need your opinion, experience, and expertise!

NHSA recently conducted national stakeholder interviews with service providers on policy and administrative barriers to two-generation programming (aka: whole-family, wrap-around, and/or holistic services). We invite you to learn about our primary findings and explore strategies to advance practical solutions for out-of-school and out-of-work youth with dependent children.

We are hosting two national practitioners' webinars to outline our initial findings from advocate and practitioner interviews and to hear directly from human services organizations providing two-generation programming. Please join us for one of the sessions below:

Friday, March 20, 2015, 10:00am – 11:30am EDT. Click here to register

Monday, March 23, 2015, 1:00pm - 2:30pm EDT. Click here to register

Please forward this information to your regional and local affiliates! The target audience for these calls are direct service providers. The feedback will better inform our research and help organizations facing barriers to two-generation program implementation.

The National Human Services Assembly is an association of America's leading nonprofit human service providers. It was created by top national executives in the sector, who believed their organizations could accomplish more collectively than individually to advance their missions and optimize performance. The Assembly is comprised of roughly eighty-five members, most of which are national headquarters of service provider organizations. These groups and their respective local networks collectively engage with nearly every household in the country.
