Edward Schenk is a management-side employment lawyer and litigator who counsels employers of all sizes when they need help. He advises senior management and key personnel on handling everything from the daily human resource question to defending them in lawsuits filed by individuals and classes of employees, Providing direct answers to increasingly complicated questions in a language and style that his clients appreciate.

Government enforcement actions of federal employment laws are increasingly common, and potentially costly, for employers of all sizes. Edward is experienced in representing employers in EEOC, DOL, NLRB and OFCCP investigations and enforcement actions arising from Title VII (including accusations of discrimination based on race, sex and religion), age and disability discrimination, retaliation, fair labor standards, employee misclassification, family medical leave and a variety of other state and federal employment laws. He drafts, reviews and litigates employment contracts and restrictive covenants, including non-competition, non-solicitation and confidentiality agreements. Edward acts as a preferred outside employment law and litigation counsel to a number of North Carolina and regional companies, including one of North Carolina's largest privately owned medical transportation providers and a large hospital system. Edward helps his clients avoid liability risks where they can, manages them when they develop, and defends against their consequences if they are realized.
