

Dear Presbyterians:

I recently wrote an article in the News Sentinel about Knoxville College falling on hard times. The article was in the March 4 section of Perspective's Letters to the Editor. In the article, I mentioned how the Presbyterian Church has always helped the school, and that the school was founded by the Presbyterian Church.

In addition, the school lost its accreditation several years ago, and we as Presbyterians need to do our part in helping the school in any way we can; whether it be monetarily, prayerfully, helping with repairs, etc.

Also, not too long ago, I talked with the President of Knoxville College, and I asked him what it would take to restore their accreditation. He told me the school needed a full-time librarian and an outside auditing firm. The estimated cost for the librarian and auditing firm would be $100,000. However, if we do our part, we might come up with a more reasonable cost.

In closing, I would like to say Knoxville College has been a vital part of our community for more than 100 years, and the school needs our support! Let's all pitch in and do our part to help the school once again be a vital part of our community.

Sincerely,

Randy Webb
