Creative Writing

- Many children know about the importance of conflict in a story and the need for description in storytelling, but how do we write about a conflict in a way that makes a plot more exciting? How do we write a description that makes readers care more about a character? In this workshop, we'll explore how stories are a series of moments, called scenes. We'll experiment with ways to make those moments feel more real, so they spring to life for readers. The goal will be for each child to create a story featuring scenes and characters we care about. Along the way, students will build skills to make them more engaging communicators in all of their writing.
