

Symphony No. 1 in D major, "Titan"

Gustav Mahler

Born in Kalischt (now Kaliště, Jihlava), Bohemia, July 7, 1860; died in Vienna, May 18, 1911

"Down with program books! They propagate false ideas!" shouted Mahler at a dinner party. "The audience should be left to its own thoughts about the work that is being played. It should not be prejudiced in any manner." Mahler wavered on the issue of providing program notes throughout his life. He supplied no program when his Symphonic Poem in Two Parts (as the First Symphony was originally called) was first performed in Budapest on November 20, 1889. Although the orchestra was enthusiastic about the work, public reaction was cold and one critic blamed Mahler for not providing the audience with any programmatic guide.

In January 1893 Mahler revised the score, renamed the work, and added programmatic titles. When he conducted the work for the second time, in October in Hamburg, he provided these titles with limited explanation:

Part I: From the Days of Youth. Flower, Fruit, and Thorn Pieces

1. Spring without End. The introduction represents the awakening of nature at dawn.
2. A Chapter of Flowers.
3. Under Full Sail.

Part II: Commedia Umana [Human Comedy]

4. Stranded! A funeral march in the manner of Callot [sixteenth-century etcher and engraver]. The following is to serve as explanation if necessary. The composer found the external stimulus to this piece from a pictorial parody, The Hunter's Funeral Procession, well known to all children in southern Germany. [Scholars believe Mahler was actually thinking of an early nineteenth-century woodcut by Moritz von Schwind, not Callot.] The forest animals accompany the dead hunter's coffin to the grave. The hares carry flags; in front is a band of Gypsy musicians and music-making cats, frogs, crows, and so on, while deer, stags, foxes and other four-footed and feathered denizens of the woods accompany the procession in comic postures. In the present piece the imagined expression is partly ironically gay, partly gloomily brooding. The movement is immediately followed by

5. Dall'Inferno al Paradiso [From Hell to Heaven], the sudden outbreak of a profoundly wounded heart.

By the time the Symphony was published Mahler again felt such a revulsion for programmatic explanations that none appear in the score. Yet as late as 1896 he wrote to Berlin critic and composer Max Marschalk that there was some justification for the title Titan and for the program—even though these were attached after the actual composition, were inadequate, and tended to mislead the public.

The subtitle Titan was once assumed to refer to a mythological figure, then to the Jean-Paul Richter novel, but Natalie Bauer-Lechner insisted in a 1900 letter and in her Recollections that Mahler simply intended it to indicate his general feelings toward the Symphony and to represent his own idea of a hero of the Titan race as he dealt with Fate. Although Mahler later deleted the subtitle just as he had the programmatic explanations, it remained affixed for commercial reasons.

The five items in Mahler's program refer to movements of the Symphony: "Spring Without End" to the first, "Under Full Sail" to the scherzo, "The Hunter's Funeral Procession" to the third, and "Dall'Inferno al Paradiso" to the finale. "A Chapter of Flowers" refers to the "Blumine" movement only relatively recently published in 1967 from the original manuscript that Mahler had given to student and life-long friend Jenny Feld Perrin, whose family kept it until 1959. The purchaser, Mrs. James M. Osborn, donated it to the New Haven Symphony Orchestra. Though motivically related to parts of the scherzo and finale, Mahler eliminated this movement during the major 1896 revisions and decided not to include it in the Symphony's 1898 and 1906 publications, indicating his final thoughts on the matter.

Though the Symphony was composed primarily between 1884 and 1888 (revised in

