President's Comments

Wait – don't order yet! Get a free Ginsu knife set with every legal consultation!
Farfetched? Have you watched television lately? The reality is that some of us are going too far in promoting ourselves. Way too far.

Some of us advertise on web pages, mail-outs and coffee cups. Some of us use billboards, television and radio. Some still use the phonebook. Some of us advertise reluctantly. Others have great enthusiasm for it. Some of us spend enormous amounts of money on advertising. Some of us who advertise seem to have a talent for it, are creative and energetic, and evidently harvest a multitude of clients with it. Some of us dabble, and aren't sure if our ads are working.

Some of us don't advertise at all, because we find it demeaning or too expensive, or because we are doing well without it. Some of us believe that advertising on television, radio, billboards, etc. should be prohibited, and that it signals the corruption of the profession. Regardless of our own views on the subject, the United States Supreme Court has held that lawyers can advertise, at least to some extent. Consequently, lawyer advertising has become a fact of our professional lives.

Lawyers who advertise tend to resent being criticized by lawyers who do not, for a variety of reasons. Maybe the non-advertising lawyer can be successful without advertising, but others who do not have an existing client base need to be more aggressive to survive in today's competitive marketplace. Some plaintiff lawyers who advertise consider defense lawyers who complain about it to be hypocrites, believing that if there was a highway reserved for corporate executives and insurance company presidents, it would sprout defense firm billboards every hundred yards. Advertising lawyers sometimes dismiss complaints about their more provocative advertisements as the product of jealousy and the close-mindedness that always accompanies change.

Even those opposed to lawyer advertising struggle to explain how individuals in the community who need legal help are supposed to figure out who is the best lawyer for them. While some people can get guidance from knowledgeable friends or acquaintances, many have no clue which lawyer to call. These people might end up making their selection based on what they see on the side of a city bus, in a radio or television commercial, or on an I-65 billboard. Whether that is a healthy way to choose representation is open to discussion.

Lawyer advertisements run the gamut from classy and understated to loud, crude and embarrassing. Most are restrained and reasonable. The worst of them, however, feed the perception of many citizens that lawyers would have to add a considerable increment of class and integrity to rise to the level of used car salesmen.

This therefore is not an indictment of all lawyer advertising, or a condemnation of those of us who do it. The problem is that even though most lawyers in our area are responsible with their marketing, some have made their ads a celebration of bad taste and questionable accuracy. Those lawyers need to be reined in.

It would be difficult to find a consensus among Mobile lawyers on where the line is between acceptable and unacceptable advertising. No doubt, any effort by us to regulate advertising would be difficult and controversial. Should we require that an advertisement be dignified? If so, according to whose judgment? Should we put limits on where lawyers can advertise? If so, where would advertising be excluded? Which restrictions on lawyer advertising would violate our constitutional right of free speech, and which ones would withstand challenge? If you question whether we should try, however, check out the television ad for "The Alabama Hammer." The lawyer in the ad tells those watching to call him and get the "Big Check." Then several individuals give brief testimonials and proudly show off their "Big Checks" of $250,000 and $295,000.

Here are five starting points for controlling ourselves when it comes to advertising.

(1) If your ad could be mistaken for a Saturday Night Live parody, go back to the drawing board. Have lawyers you respect preview your ad and give you feedback on it. If they find it embarrassing to the profession, go another direction.

(2) Just because you can put an advertisement somewhere doesn't mean you should. We already have them on automobiles and buses. It won't be long before we have lawyer advertisements on blimps hovering over football stadiums. It no doubt is possible for a lawyer to hire an airplane to drag a banner along the beach during the summer, along with fifty cent beer and wet tee shirt ads, but is that really appropriate?

(3) No lawyer should run an ad that is dishonest or misleading. In other words, what is represented must be true. If a lawyer does not go to court, he should not suggest to the public that he is a tiger in the courtroom. If the lawyer acts primarily as a broker rather than actually handling cases, the ad should not indicate that the lawyer will do the heavy lifting. The key principle is that advertisements by lawyers must be accurate.

Aside: Should lawyers who serve primarily as brokers or clearing houses for cases be required to disclose that fact to the public? We could debate each other on that point. Some argue that since it is in the economic interest of the broker/lawyer who advertises to refer cases to the lawyers who will be most likely to succeed in the case, the public benefits. The idea is the broker/lawyer knows better than the public who is the most capable lawyer for a particular case, and the client and the broker/lawyer share an interest in maximizing the recovery in the case. This leaves open the issue of whether the advertising lawyer has really "earned" a sizeable referral fee merely by acting as a conduit for cases to the lawyers who have the actual skills and ability. Another topic ripe for debate, perhaps.

(4) Lawyer advertisements should not unfairly raise expectations, or pander to the worst impulses of the public. Viewers should be able to differentiate between lawyer and casino advertisements. The idea that hiring the lawyer will lead to the client's wallet or purse being stuffed with big bills is demeaning to us as lawyers and a fraud on the public, even if there is a small print disclaimer in the ad stating that every case is dependent on its facts or some such. Too many lawyer advertisements seem to be promising a glorious windfall or spectacular payday regardless of facts or circumstances. Going to court is not like appearing on a game show, and our advertisements should not make it sound like it is.

(5) Lawyers should not overstate their skill level. If the accomplishments and abilities of the lawyer as judged by his or her peers are dramatically inferior to what the advertisement proclaims, the ad might need to be reworked. Our advertisements should not elicit guffaws and chuckles from colleagues and judges.

There is plenty of room for reasonable disagreement when it comes to lawyer advertising. It cannot be denied, however, that some of it has gotten out of hand. Too many of our advertisements are misleading, offensive and/or embarrassing. We need to get a hold of ourselves for the good of our profession and draw some lines. The alternative is to allow tasteless advertisements to destroy what is left of our image and self-respect. Some say we are already too far gone to salvage. Surely, though, we are not helpless. Or is the shame we feel from an advertisement featuring a lawyer who seems closer to a carnival barker than a professional advocate now an anachronism – a vestige of a belief in the honor and dignity of the profession that has been proven to be just an illusion? Some of these ads portray us all as nothing more than shills and mercenaries with advanced degrees. It's time to make an objection.

SIGNIFICANT DECISIONS

BY DUANE GRAHAM

In an apparent case of first impression and over the dissenting vote of JUSTICE SHAW, the Alabama Supreme Court in Hand v. Howell, Sarto & Hand, No. 1120133 (Ala., May 31, 2013), held that it did not constitute legal malpractice for the plaintiff's lawyer in an vehicle accident case not to name the defendant's employer as an additional defendant. While the plaintiff argued that a jury would have awarded more damages against a "deep-pocket" defendant, the Court concluded that the named defendant was insured under the same policies available to the employer and that the jury would "follow the law" and not increase the amount of damages awarded simply due to the perceived wealth of the absent defendant.

In another apparent case of first impression, the Supreme Court in Ex parte Tyson Foods, Inc., No. 1110931 (Ala., May 24, 2013), refused to issue a writ of mandamus and let stand a trial court's order permitting the substitution of the decedent's dependent widow as the plaintiff in lieu of the decedent's personal representative in a wrongful death case in which the dependent was the proper plaintiff, notwithstanding that the two-year statute of limitations had run on the claim. In effect, the trial court allowed the amendment under Rule 17 to relate back to the filing of the original complaint.

In yet another case of first impression, the Supreme Court in Health Care Authority for Baptist Health v. Davis, No. 1090084 (Ala., May 17, 2013), held that a health care authority created under the Health Care Authorities Act of 1982, Ala. Code § 22-21-310, et seq., was not entitled to state immunity against medical malpractice claims and was furthermore not entitled to the protection of the $100,000 damages cap of Ala. Code § 11-93-2 that was argued to have been incorporated into the Act.

In still another case of first impression, the Supreme Court in The Pantry, Inc. v. Mosley, No. 1110759 (Ala., May 3, 2013), held that it was unreasonable for a landlord to refuse to consent to the assignment of lease on the ground that she thought the lease was not a very good deal from her standpoint and she wanted to use the assignment event and the lease's requirement that any assignment could only be made with the landlord's consent as an opportunity to negotiate a better deal.
