

Why translate your English materials? Doesn't everyone speak English? In many parts of the world, English training is required, often in the middle school years, and it is certainly one of the most important languages of business and science. Not all documents need to be translated, of course, and we will tell our clients when translation is unnecessary and when to use one of the free translation utilities.

If general understanding and a basic information transfer is all that's required, translation may not be warranted. (We will, however, help you write absolutely precise English to communicate as clearly as possible.)

Legal documents, instruction manuals, research reports, patents are another story. Where exact understanding is crucial and particularly where liability may be involved, translation is a worthwhile investment that may pay for itself by preventing costly misunderstandings.

In some cases, translation is required by law and fines can be steep for noncompliance.

There is another consideration. Have you ever laughed at an English sign in a foreign country or been unable to read an "English" menu? Reverse the situation and think about the reactions you want to elicit with your documents. Tembua's staff of working authors and editors offer that final polish your documents need to project your corporate image.
